

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Bell Bowl Prairie destruction doesn't make sense

An article in the most recent edition of the National Wildlife Federation magazine featured the Bell Bowl Prairie which is slated to be destroyed this month by the Chicago/Rockford International airport.

In its infinite wisdom the airport board finds that a service road is more important than a 10,000 year old prairie remnant.

Does this make any sense? What is wrong with people who don't seem to understand that saving a small prairie will save something really rare and irreplaceable? I find their action reprehensible.
